William Huang and Kaitlin McGee

The Honors College at Rutgers University-Camden is delighted to introduce the third edition of The Undergraduate Review for the Spring of 2021 semester—an academic journal by the students, for the students. The Undergraduate Review provides an exciting platform for the students to publish their academic and creative work and to get noticed by thousands of their fellow campus members as well as the staff and faculty at Rutgers University-Camden.

Student work in this issue is not only approved by their faculty mentors but also represents the diversity of student research and creative work at Rutgers University-Camden. Although the classrooms were empty and college work migrated online, this edition reflects the resiliency and hard work of our student body in the face of an unprecedented international event. Indeed, we were delighted to receive S.N. Taylor's submission about student resiliency and included it as an introduction to this edition and a celebration of student success during the pandemic.

Rutgers University–Camden is home to award-winning, innovative, creative, and distinguished undergraduate students. We thank all the students who have taken the time to submit their work. We would like to give special appreciation to our faculty advisors who have made the second edition of this journal possible: Dr. Lee Ann Westman, director of the Honors College and Brian Everett, assistant dean of the Honors College. As a reader, we hope that you enjoy every article and gain a little insight in our family of Rutgers University-Camden. This journal is a testament to the ambition and drive of our student body, whose accomplishments cannot be undermined even by a global health crisis. Get noticed; be remembered.
